WATERCOLORS FOR ALL

The field of watercolor painting is alive and well — more than well, actually. The artform really got moving in the 18th century, particularly in Britain, and its visibility has ebbed and flowed over time. Today is, in many ways, a new golden age for watercolorists, with societies active at the national, state, and local level, and with international collaborations becoming increasingly frequent. Watercolor works are regularly integrated into mainstream art exhibitions, and pieces by such historical masters as Winslow Homer and Andrew Wyeth trade for high prices on the secondary market.

With all this good news, we must keep in mind that watercolors — like all works made on paper — are vulnerable to fading through overexposure to light. (No matter how expensive or well-made it is, the paper itself degrades slowly in light.) Though it may look and “feel” like an oil or acrylic painting, your beloved watercolor will lose its vibrancy if it’s not framed properly and kept away from windows. For details on how to care for your treasures, visit the website of the American Institute for Conservation (culturalheritage.org), and if you want to learn to make some yourself, register for the Watercolor Live online conference (January 21–23, 2026) at watercolorlive.com.

In these pages, we are thrilled to highlight an array of talented watercolorists who have kindly shared with us their latest accomplishments. Congratulations to all of them, and please keep up the great work. ●
